

What is it that we want to make of the world?

Choice is at the center of making change. We all intuitively know we have to change the way our species lives. That means making changes to the way we live our own lives. This is getting very personal. And if you are like me – uncomfortable.

I go on and on about collaborative intelligence and one aspect of this form of intelligence is how we coordinate our collective capacity. However there is a deeply personal aspect – the uncomfortable and unpopular decisions we are being called to make.

The 'Oneness Project' represents an thoughtful exploration of this important dialogue. Real collaborative intelligence demands 'glocal' decisions – choices that are made at a very local intimate level but that honor what we need to do globally to write a new story for our species.
